Michelle Miller-Adams
Senior Researcher

Michelle Miller-Adams is the author of four books and an expert on asset-building and economic development strategies. She received her PhD in political science and her Master of International Affairs from Columbia University, and she earned her Bachelor of Arts in history from the University of California, Santa Barbara, graduating Phi Beta Kappa. Her professional career has spanned the fields of nonprofit management, finance, research, and academia; positions have included consultant to the W.K. Kellogg Foundation, vice president for programs at the Twentieth Century Fund (now the Century Foundation), and vice president for research at a Wall Street investment bank. Miller-Adams was the principal investigator for a Ford Foundation-sponsored research project that resulted in the publication of Owning Up: Poverty, Assets, and the American Dream (Brookings Institution Press, 2002). She is currently a senior researcher at the W.E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, where she has written two books about the Kalamazoo Promise and the national free college movement, and a professor of political science at Grand Valley State University.

Miller-Adam’s work at the Upjohn Institute focuses on the Kalamazoo Promise and related programs. She is the author of the first comprehensive book on the Kalamazoo Promise, speaks with local and national media, and consults with communities around the nation engaged in establishing similar programs. She serves on the steering committee of the College Promise Research Network and has been involved in planning PromiseNet conferences dating back to 2008.
